

The narrator tells us how the prophet responded to all of this, how that he wrapped his face with his mantle, and came forth from the cave. It is not the overpowering of the majesty, but the goodness of God that leads to repentance. Because we know that if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me. And, so the silent heat and the power of the hammer and the anvil will bend and mold a piece of metal and so we realize that a still, small voice is needed in this age in which we live, to break the silence and the earthquake and the storm we are now in the midst of. We know that power according to Rome was symbolized in the eagle, the bird of prey with keen eyes and strong claws. We know that the emblem of Babylon was a beast dreadful and terrible, with power to break in pieces. But what was Rome and what was Greece? With all her physical and intellectual power nothing--when compared with that of Christ. We know that Ceaser conquered by arms, but Jesus Christ conquers by love.
